

Main part of the essay

The number of pages in the finished essay usually does not exceed 3-4 pages, so the main part is the most important element of work. It reflects the author's personal opinion about the problem under discussion.

The structure of the main part consists of theses and arguments. At first, the author of the essay offers the reader a thesis, i.e., a briefly formulated certain idea. This is followed by an argument. He can prove that the thought is correct if the author agrees with the thesis or that the thought is erroneous if the author objects. Arguments should succinctly demonstrate how the author came to this or that judgment, they can be based on personal experience, on the experience of others, on historical events and facts. Optionally, you can add an intermediate conclusion after each pair of "thesis - arguments" to make it easier for the reader to trace the chain of your thoughts. Or, in general, order to write an essay for professionals by requesting "write my essay cheap" a special service for writing an essay.

Example:

Thesis - the computer has replaced the book. Arguments - I agree with these words, because my home library has only a few books, and with the help of the Internet I can find almost any book at any time. Now there is no need to go to the library to take an old torn book or spend a lot of money to buy a new one. In specialized stores prices for books are inflated, and in most cases, you can download a book for free on the Internet. So the books became more accessible.

The intermediate conclusion: technical progress makes people's lives easier.

Thesis: scientific progress should not be ahead of the cultural and moral development of man. The argument is an example from life, confirming this idea. Once, the residents of developed countries decided to help an African tribe, who lived near the equator. Young Africans were taught to grow rice, and were given tractors and tools for sowing. After a year, the benefactors returned to see how the life of the tribe, who received knowledge and technology, has changed. They were disappointed when they found out that the Africans were still living according to the old customs: they sold the equipment to the farmers, and the money they received was used for a holiday.

Intermediate conclusion: a person needs to grow up to be aware of his needs, you can not change a person against his will.

It is possible to alternate theses and arguments in the main part as many times as the author needs to justify the reader's point of view.

You can use such cliches in the main part:

First, second, third; for example; I agree with the writer; unfortunately, I do not quite agree with the author's point of view; let us illustrate this judgment by example; on the one hand, on the other hand.

Once the reader has got acquainted with the main part, he should have his own opinion about the problem at hand and either accept or reject the author's point of view.
